Wheaten bread is composed principally of starch. When starch is subjected to a high temperature it is changed into an easily digested substance called dextrine. In the orinary cooking of a loaf of bread the starch in the outer layers is changed into dexirine, which helps to give the crust that peculiar, agreeable flavor which we call sweet. Silces bread undergo a similar change when toast made. To make toast successfully one must ndeavor to convert as much as possible of the starch into dextrine.
